A small Story:

A confederate Officer was making his way to his tent one night, not looking forward to the dinner of parched corn which awaited him, when he smelled the most wonderful smell of roasting meat. He investigated and found that a large group of men were gathered around a fire cooking a pig. Seeing him coming, the men formed ranks and attempted to “flank” the officer by blocking his view. The smell of roasting pork was too much to hide and the men knew it. A wizened veteran jumped forward at attention and said “Sir, while on picket last night, and in the pitch black, I heard someone coming to my post. I called “Halt” and asked for the password. All I heard in reply was “Oink” so I let fly and as it was too dark I could not tell the result; but all was quiet. In the morning we found this here “Federal” lying about where I had shot the intruder and so took him in. We we’re just going to bring him to you and have you pass judgment on him when we stopped to warm ourselves by this fire.” The Officer looked at the men and the “prisoner” and said in Solomon type manner, “Fine. After he is properly warmed bring just a portion of the prisoner to me, and I’ll pass a partial sentence.” And it was done.
